Habits and Environment

1 Introduction

Habits are formed through repetition and small actions repeated every day compound into large results over a long period of time and across many different contexts.

The second paragraph explains why the surrounding environment matters more than simple willpower in most situations that people face every day.

A third paragraph starts near the bottom of the page and the sentence does not finish before the page ends, so it must be joined with the text on the following page.

2 Method

We tracked one hundred participants for twelve weeks and measured how often they completed the target behaviour in each condition of the experiment.

Results were consistent across all groups, which supports the main hypothesis of the study.